Proteins involved in splicing and processing of human tRNAs have been identified and studied in terms of their subcellular localization, although little is known about their actual function in the nucleus. In this study, we demonstrate that the homologues of yeast Prp16 and Prp22/Trl1p are subunits of the human nuclear tRNA splicing endonuclease complex (NSEC), localized in both the nucleolus and the nucleoplasm. Furthermore, we find that the two human NSEC subunits may locate to different nucleoplasmic structures. This is shown by the co-localization of endogenous Prp16 with UBF, a marker of ribosome gene repeats, and the co-localization of endogenous Prp22 with NPAT, a marker of a specialized structural domain, the Cajal body, in addition to the nucleolus. RNA interference (RNAi) knockdown of Prp16 inhibits cleavage of pre-tRNA(Asp) at the 3' splice site, yet overexpression of RNAi-resistant Prp16 shows that the C-terminal part of the protein containing the RNaseH-like domain is primarily involved in this activity. In contrast, overexpression of RNAi-resistant Prp22 does not lead to accumulation of any other tRNA but the Prp22 overexpression inhibits cleavage of pre-tRNA(Met) at the 5' splice site and pre-tRNA(Ile) at both the 5' and 3' splice sites. Prp22 overexpression also inhibits the pre-tRNA splicing activity of NSEC, suggesting that it may act as a dominant
