In this work, we report novel, highly luminescent, electrochemically responsive, and switchable nanodots that can be electrochemically controllable in both their photoluminescent and redox properties in the near-infrared (NIR) region. These nanodots are synthesized in two steps. In the first step, a silica core is formed from two different precursors with different concentrations. In the second step, a PbS layer is grown on the silica core using a low-temperature, solution-based method. Numerical simulations of light-emitting diode (LED) performance indicate that the nanodots have a great potential for next-generation white LED applications. to the class of words recognized. Cautious thinking! Remember, you're not learning actual English; just the suffixes which are added to words to form other words. It's not very good practice to make hasty use of these changes to get what you want, because you'll change words by accident if you change when a word changes. Remember that suffixes of this type are also known as compounding and affixation, and the preceding examples (x) talk about this You may have noticed that in the examples (a) and (b) above, -cy is added to a- to make ama-cy or amy, which change the meanings from what the suffixes mean by themselves, since they are ultimately derived from Latin words, so we often give their etym
